WISCONSIN OUTSIDE | October 2021

A Note from the Director

During several recent visits with outdoor recreation businesses and stakeholders around the state, it's been inspiring to see the innovation and creativity leading the industry forward. The first-hand look at the amazing projects, products, and services of Wisconsin's outdoor industry and the enthusiasm of stakeholders to meet the newfound interest and demand for outdoor recreation is simply exciting.

Despite the growth in the outdoor recreation sector, hiring continues to be a struggle in various sectors and geographic regions. To ensure Wisconsin's perspectives and needs are considered in this national conversation, complete the Outdoor Recreation Roundtable's Outdoor Industry Workforce Assessment by October 8th. Click here to take the survey administered by Oregon State University.

As the industry works to fill positions, the Office is working to develop resources and assistance for our stakeholders' recruitment toolboxes. Promoting the attractiveness of outdoor recreation communities is one of those tools, as is information about the four-season lifestyle and recreational amenities in each community, both of which can be influential in a job seeker's decision making. We hope you find this presentation template useful in your next recruitment effort, and additional resources are listed below. We also encourage you to reach out to us for any additional requests.

As we head into fall, we hope you find the time to take advantage of what Wisconsin's outdoors has to offer in this colorful season!

Outdoor Recreation Counties Attract Residents & Talent

Since the onset of the pandemic, the outdoor industry has been able to find the so-called silver linings in what has been an unprecedented situation. Positive outlooks and creative innovations allowed companies and organizations to pivot around obstacles and keep things moving forward, welcoming more and more new people into the outdoors. While supply chain issues are still present, the industry has met this challenge head on and been credited for helping keep sectors of the economy afloat.

As the journey continues, it's evident the outdoor industry isn't immune to the workforce shortage being experienced across the nation. For many reasons, ranging from housing, lack of childcare to career changes and more, businesses of all types are finding it difficult to fill vacancies.

To be competitive in the hiring market, employers, and even cities and regions, are getting creative. A major Wisconsin printing company is advertising its open positions on billboards with a $2,000 hiring bonus. In Northwest Arkansas, people that relocate to the region for work can apply for a $10,000 reward and a new bike or membership to a museum; in West Virginia, a similar program offers $10,000 up front plus free outdoor recreation for a year, and another $2,000 for staying a full year.

With 7.1 million more Americans drawn outside last year (a total of 160.7 million) coupled with the boom of “Zoom towns,” outdoor recreation is a value proposition the industry has long known but is now being leveraged as an incentive for talent recruitment.

Trails can offer a number of recreational opportunities attractive to residents and job seekers when developed with a strategic system that balances multiple users.

A 2019 report from Headwaters Economics revealed that nationwide, on average, “recreation counties” (as defined by the USDA’s Economic Research Service as having large recreation-related economies) especially in rural areas were more successful in attracting residents than “non-recreation counties.” While many communities have seen the economic benefit of outdoor recreation that comes from visitor spending, many have not fully understood the long-term economic benefits of drawing new visitors and businesses. The study also showed earnings per job was less in recreation counties, but it grew six times faster than in non-recreation counties.

As rural communities fight the trend of declining population and as businesses work to attract talent, investing in and promoting outdoor recreation offerings can be an important part of the economic development plan.

“ What We’re Hearing ”

“When Coni and I were living in Arizona around 2009 and thinking about where we wanted to live permanently, we agreed that the Driftless Area of southwestern Wisconsin would be ideal. It has plenty of career and outdoor recreation opportunities to fit our interests and lifestyle. Best decision ever; we appreciate the sense of community, appreciation for natural resources, and welcoming embrace that thrives here. After traveling, hunting or fishing in nearly all states, various countries and three continents, we’re happy to call Wisconsin home.”
